

MOON :: 2009 movie review Moon is a 2009 Science fiction movie Directed by Duncan Jones and starring Sam Rockwell, about a man all alone on a lunar mining station. We meet Sam Bell (Sam Rockwell) who is a man all alone on the moon, mining a new form of energy call helium-3 which was solved the world's energy crisis. He has a robot to keep him company named Gerty (voiced by Kevin Spacey), he then learns what's really going on by chance and has to take steps to rectify it. This is a good not great film and since it's All about Sam Bell, Sam Rockwell has to shine and he does. There is a back story and it works well to drive the plot, but it's hard to have deep conversations between a robot and a solitary astronaut. Every time I hear Kevin Spacey's voice I think of Swimming with Sharks and his character Buddy Ackerman but that's just me, really if you think of that as the robot it's really quite funny But, really he is a good choose for this character and does great voiceovers to make it work and it does. He is just a few weeks out from his replacement arriving when strange things start to happen in his space station. He starts to see weird hallucinations and glitches in his transmissions back home, and then has a freak accident.
